Field of the Invention The present invention generally relates to medical methods, systems, and devices. In particular, the invention relates to a surgical tool for controlled placement of the tines of a tine-based electrode into the heart. 2. Description of the Prior Art Tiny electrically conductive particles (typically tines) may be placed in contact with the surface of the heart to deliver an electrical shock to the heart to defibrillate the heart. The application of electrical shock energy may be used to achieve fibrillation quiescence when an arrhythmia is induced during the administration of cardioversion or defibrillation electrical therapy. A number of tine-based electrodes have been developed to facilitate heart defibrillation. For example, a number of tine-based defibrillation electrodes are described in U.S. Pat. No. 6,089,090 to Steele et al., U.S. Pat. No. 5,131,388 to Smits, U.S. Pat. No. 5,107,850 to Haluska et al., U.S. Pat. No. 5,857,975 to Smits, U.S. Pat. No. 5,871,524 to Strallan et al., and U.S. Pat. No. 5,862,005 to Hall et al. These examples of the state of the art electrodes are carried on a catheter, which is inserted into a patient's heart, or on a conductive paddle mounted to the exterior of a patient's body. In particular, the tine-based electrodes typically include a plurality of insulated tines that are mounted to one another in parallel arrays. The tines are delivered to a target site of the patient's heart by controlling the delivery of a force that rotates the tine-based electrode and an associated stylet. The rotation causes the tines to extend from the electrode, thus delivering 1cdb36666d
