Severe idiopathic pneumonia syndrome (SIP syndrome) is a poorly recognized disorder, characterized by severe respiratory failure in immunosuppressed patients. Its pathogenesis is unknown but is linked to cytokine dysregulation. SIP syndrome has been reported with clinical features similar to the respiratory distress syndrome, but only when immunosuppression is reduced or withdrawn. We report a case of a patient who developed SIP syndrome after hematopoietic stem cell transplantation (HSCT) and we discuss about the possible relationship with cytotoxic therapy.There is a continuous desire to improve the devices, systems and processes for manufacturing semiconductor devices. The desire is a result of a need to reduce production costs and shorten processing times. It is well known that there is a relationship between time and cost. Thus, while there may be a need for new and improved processes for manufacturing semiconductor devices, there also may be a desire to minimize the time required for such processing. One of the most important components in semiconductor processing is the deposition system. Typical deposition systems include a substrate support, such as a pedestal, that supports a substrate (or wafer) to be treated by the deposition system. The pedestal may be coupled to or integrated with a gas supply module. A substrate or wafer may be supported by the pedestal, and a gas may be supplied to the substrate through the gas supply module. A plasma may be generated by applying a potential to the pedestal, and the plasma may be used to deposit material on the surface of a substrate. Deposition systems of the type described above are employed to deposit films at various steps during manufacturing of semiconductor devices. One such step is the formation of an anti-reflective coating (ARC) which is formed over a patterned photoresist layer. The ARC layer is formed by applying a spin on glass (SOG) to the wafer. The SOG layer is then selectively exposed using a photolith

How do you clean your own lens? It might seem simple enough to clean your lenses with a fingernail and a lint roller, but there are several things to keep in mind as well. Otherwise it can be incredibly painful for your eyes! It's no secret that a healthy eyesight is key to most of our daily activities. As you get older it gets harder and harder to see, whether it's for driving, reading, or watching TV or video. So, what can you do to your eye care to protect it from all the wear and tear? Well, you can take measures to protect it from the environment that you live in. We're going to talk about how to clean your own lenses, because although this might seem crazy or gross, the truth is it is a really effective way to do it and also lets you do it more frequently than what you could do if you tried it the more conventional way. Thumb Method: According to most of the research and info I've found online, cleaning your own lenses with your thumb should be avoided, because doing it that way can cause eye infections as well as tears. So, what you can do instead is to use a microfiber cloth, which is a little bit softer than the fingertips and is flimsy enough to not scratch the lense in anyway. You should also avoid touching your eye directly with a wet cloth, or the water from the cloth because this can result in a mess in your eye and could lead to eye infections. Once you've chosen your microfiber cloth, you need to make sure the little hole at the corner of the cloth is pointing straight up. This is so that you can place the cloth on the side of your eye without accidently touching your eye with the cloth. To clean a lens, start by getting your hand wet by dipping a microfiber cloth into the water and then wipe down your lens and lids. You can do this one eye at a time, or you can do both at once. You can now use your other hand to hold the water cloth to keep it from dripping. Use the same method
