The background beat in standard ECG recordings contains unipolar noise, which could influence the accuracy of the QRS detection. Moreover, unipolar noise could change the interpretation of standard recordings of digitalized ECG signals in the presence of movement artifacts. Consequently, it is important to measure the bias induced by the unipolar noise on the ECG and assess whether some artifact removal algorithms are effective on it. Although it has been previously shown that quiescent intervals are more affected by noise, we study here the influence of unipolar noise on the QRS detection. The dynamic behavior of the ECG components is analyzed, for both low and high noise levels, in the presence of signal-dependent or signal-independent unipolar noise. The mean values of QRS detection are compared to the optimal thresholds obtained in a signal-free environment. A real-time adaptive analysis is proposed to improve QRS detection in the presence of unipolar noise. B-cell lymphoma kinase-transformed cells from B-cell chronic lymphocytic leukemia are resistant to single agent etoposide. In order to characterize the differences between the cell lines established from B-cell chronic lymphocytic leukemia (B-CLL) and mantle cell lymphoma (MCL), we performed extensive gene expression profiling of six cell lines, established from CLL patients. Twenty-eight upregulated genes were identified, some of which are known to be related to B-CLL pathogenesis, such as X-linked inhibitor of apoptosis, NACHT, LRR and PYD domains-containing protein 3, B-cell lymphoma 2-like 11, and cyclin E2. However, four of 28 upregulated genes were related to drug resistance, including quinone reductase 1, leucyl-tRNA synthetase, Rho family GTPase activating protein 1, and solute carrier protein family 22 (glutamate). Our data showed that X-linked inhibitor of apoptosis was expressed higher in B-CLL cell lines, and Etoposide treatment induced X-linked inhibitor of apoptosis, which led to drug resistance of B-CLL d0c515b9f4
